No, man, those goggles weren't made yesterday.

PEOPLE & PLACES

Just too late for the trick or treat trade, Douglas Anderson, a graduate student at Brown University, is shown in the picture modeling goggles made of ivory and designed to cut down the glare from the snow. They were dug up at Cape Krusenstern, Alaska, and are believed to be 2,000 years old. Mr. Anderson is considerably younger.

A man in the street in Providence was asked a provocative question: "What do you think of 'Tropic of Cancer'?" He thought it over and replied, "I never read medical books."

Mrs. John F. Kennedy, youngest and most beautiful woman to grace the White House, is about to salute one of the oldest and ugliest rulers of all. She will open an exhibit at the National Gallery in Washington of Tut's gunslingers. The parade is to draw attention to the Bristol Follies, staged by the Bristol Junior Women's Club to raise funds to outfit a Civil Defense ambulance. For the benefit of those over the age for cap pistols, the chorus line from the show will take part in the parade.

Old trolleys never die, they just get shipped to South America, or made into diners or other structures. One in Warwick, stripped of its wheels many years ago and set up as a dwelling on Charlestown Avenue, has been condemned as part of the city's minimum housing program. But if the suggestion of Mayor Horace E. Hobbs is carried out, it will blossom forth next summer as a repainted and refurbished bathhouse for 10 persons at the Warwick City Park beach. The bathhouse
